

David Rejino serves as Assistant Vice Chancellor for State Relations for the Texas A&M University System. He first started working at the A&M System State Relations office in January of 1994 as a student worker while pursuing an undergraduate degree in Economics from the University of Texas at Austin. He graduated from UT in December in 1994 and enrolled part-time at Texas State University's Master's of Public Administration Program in 1995; he attained his MPA degree in August of 2000. In the meantime, he continued working for the State Relations office in various full-time capacities. In 1999, he was given the responsibility of external governmental relations, working with university administrators and elected officials at the State Capitol.

Currently, David serves as the legislative liaison for three of the general academic institution in the System (Tarleton State University, Texas A&M University-Central Texas, and West Texas A&M University). His primary focus during the legislative sessions is working with each institution to maximize their legislative appropriation while monitoring legislation as it makes it was thru the process. David's legislative areas of responsibility center on benefit/human resource issues, facilities/construction issues, information technology issues and general state government issues, such as state contracting issues, along with any institution specific legislation that may be filed.

David was born and raised in Friona, which is located in the western part of the Texas Panhandle. He now calls Austin home. He is married to Tara Cowen Rejino and they have one 13 year old daughter (Isabella). His hobbies include grilling on his Big Green Egg and burning excess calories gained from his Egg via cycling and running.
